Keywords: World Trade Center--Collapse, 2001/ Highrise buildings--Fire safety/ Standpipes/ Physical fitness/ Occupational safety
Abstract: A series of UK research projects highlighted disparities between the physical abilities of firefighters and the duties they are expected to perform. The group used both simulated and live fire conditions in their study. Given current equipment and techniques, the group recommends firefighters go no further than 35 meters into a fire compartment to rescue a casualty (assuming no stair climbing is involved).

The study also made recommendations on tactics at highrises and in unventilated compartments. The group is involved with making recommendations in changing building codes to reflect firefighter abilities and safety concerns.  Abstract: After 9/11/01, middle school children began raising money to replace one of FDNY's vehicles. When their principal asked the local fire chief for information on what a fire truck might cost, she was told an amazing story. Following Sherman's burning of Columbia, SC by Northern troops in the Civil War, the city's fire department made an appeal for donated equipment. New York City firefighters raised $5000 for a hose carriage, hose, hats, trumpets, shirts, and belts --all new. After the equipment was lost at sea, New Yorkers replaced the gear and even helped rebuild CFD's quarters. In gratitude, the statement was made that Columbia would return the kindness if disaster should ever strike New York City. The kindness was indeed repaid by Columbia; the Middle School raised $500,000 for a new ladder truck

Abstract: The WTC was the first building outside the military and nuclear industries which was designed to withstand the impact of an aircraft. The 1964 analysis used a Boeing 707 (assumed to be trying to land and therefore slow and light on fuel) in its scenarios. Charts compare size of aircraft against the footprint of the towers, from the B-25 which hit the Empire State Building in 1945 to the A380 (slated for introduction in 2006)

Abstract: The directors of the Missouri Fire Fighters Memorial Foundation worked for three years to fund and commission a 3,000-pound bronze statue of a firefighter kneeling in prayer. The 6' x 6' memorial was at US customs at Kennedy Airport when terrorists struck on 9/11/01. The directors decided it should stay in New York; the Pennsylvania company that had handled the artwork and had it executed in Italy agreed pay for a copy of the original made which will go to Missouri. The Matthews Bronze Company also transported the statue free of charge from the airport to Manhattan. At this writing, the statue is at 44th St. and 8th Avenue in Manhattan

Abstract: "The USPHS visits were probably skewed to milder complaints as compared to hospital cases or ailments reported to employer medical departments; however, given the close proximity of the stations to the damage, analyses of the USPHS visits do provide a more complete picture of the safety and health impact on those who were at or near the WTC site. This is true especially for milder, although still significant, respiratory, eye, headache, gastroesophageal, and traumatic injury complaints. Emergency planners may be able to use this information from the WTC tragedy as they prepare for future events."
